Capt. Corey's Curiousity Corner

We were seated on our beach chairs and resting delightfully. It was a pleasant summer day. Next to us was a teen age boy who was also seated on a chair. He was listening to some music from his radio. But he wasn't holding it nor was it on the blanket next to his chair. Being of a curious nature I went up to him and asked him where it was. He has built a special pocket beneath the side of his chair and it held the radio. The pocket was nothing more than cloth cut out. His mother had sewed it for him and then he had attached it to the bottom of the chair.

There are many ways in which the small transistor radio can be concealed. One of my friends has made a book a container for his radio. This is simple to make. Measure your radio. Then with ruler and pencil make an outline on page twenty of the book. Which means the first few pages will not be cut through. Then with a single-edge razor blade start cutting through the outine. You do this page after page. Actually you can cut through several pages at a time. When you are deep enough for the radio then stop the cutting.

How to hold the pages together? I tried to use glue and actually glued each sheet to the other. But it wasn't a very satisfactory job that I did. Another way is to use those long paper clips from brass that bend back. You drill a hole through the pages. Make enough around the outside the pages seem free. Then hold together with these clips.

Since there must be a bottom you go through another twenty pages to support the radio. But what the first pages of the book? You punch holes where the speaker will be underneath. You can attach a clip to hold the pages together. However if the cover of the book is closed the music will be muffled when you play the radio. You cut through the cover of the book at the same spot where the radio is underneath with the speaker.

But won't it show? Not if you are clever. You paste a square of plastic netting over the opening. You can draw a window around it so it looks like a window in the summer. Or if you do not want to do it this way you can punch holes through the cover. When you carry your book-radio you should have a rubber band around the book to prevent it from opening and dumping the radio out.

I saw one idea that got a laugh from all of us. It was a little doll with the radio inside. The back had been cut out and the radio inserted. It looked almost like a singing doll when the radio started to "give with music." You also use your carrying bag to conceal the radio. Our carrying bag has a small additional pocket on the outside. We keep the radio in this when we go on a fishing trip. And our bag thus pays the latest music-at least that is the way it seems. Some of these transistor radios are so small that you can actually conceal one in a pocket on the back of your head. This gives you the music right in back of your ear. You sit, smile, and listen to the music. While those around you wonder the radio is concealed.

Picnic Games

The best way to enjoy a picnic is to take good food with you. And then after you have eaten and rested you want to enjoy yourself with games. Here is a simple game that will liven up your picnic. You draw upon the ground or the sand a box that is six feet wide and fifteen feet long. You need empty cans. Either soda or beer cans will do. Check each can and be certain there are no rough edges on the sides that may cut your fingers. You will be in charge of the cans. Another person is in charge of the score.

You place three cans on the ground. Two cans are two inches apart and on top of the two cans there is the third can. You put these cans on the back line of your box figuring the line on the length that is fifteen feet in length. You can have two players so you have another set of cans the same way.

Sometimes old baseballs are used. However we found that the safest kind of a ball is an old tennis ball. You may have teams or the boys and girls may play individually. A boy stands at the other end of the fifteen foot length. He has a ball in his hand ready to throw. He is told the following:

"You want to throw the ball and hit all three cans in such a way that they fall down and lie sideways on the ground. Only then do you get a point. You may try three times. Then the next person is up."

You keep score. To make it interesting you may offer a first prize to persons with highest score. And a second prize to the person with the next highest score. You probably will also need an assistant to keep the score. If your friends find that this game is easy and they are all making high scores you can challenge them to try to throw balls at a "doube,,. You place your two cans on the ground and a third can on the two cans. Then one inch away you repeat. Now this time the thrower has to hit all six balls with a ball. Throw them all down so that they lie flat on the sand. This is a tough one to do.

You can use larger size cans you so desire. These are the 46 ounce can. While the target does seem bigger-it really is more difficult to knock the three large cans to the ground. If you don't believe me-just try it and keep a matching score.

If you can get big plastic bottles you can use these. Do not use glass bottles because there is the danger that they might crack, split, and a piece of glass get into the sand. A bare foot and a piece of glass are never good friends.

This can be done with a combination of "Bindman Buff." You put a handkerchief around a boy's eyes. He sees just where the cans are located. He can even take a few practice shots. Then he must throw the ball when you gave the signal. This too looks simple and you will be surprised at how many balls go astray. You can have a team of three boys against three girls and the team with the highest score wins.

One should have a variety of simple games to play when you are on a picnic. If you want a name for this game we decided to call it: "Hit-O-Ball."

A is for Antartica

Most boys and girls think of Antartica as a great white chunk of ice. With penguins sprinkled along the coastline. And on the surface they might be right. The continent itself supports almost no wildlife. A few strange insects exist there and some forms of mosses and lichens can be found. But almost nothing else. Although in some areas coarse grasses can be found, the rocky mountains are generally bare.

The seas surrounding Antartica, however, are almost the exact opposite. Scientists have estimated that one acre of Antartic sea contains more food and life than one acre of land or water found anyplace else in the world. Some of the types of life found in Antartica live on the continent or the pack ice. But they are dependent on the sea for their food.

Perhaps the most interesting and amusing creatures found in Antartica are the penguins. The two best known varieties of Antartic penguins are the Emperor and the Adelie. The Emperor is the dignified host of the southern continent, and these stately creatures waddle around paying little attention to anything. The Adelies on the other hand are the clowns of the Antartic. They play in the water and are always curious about anything man does. Adelies grow to a height of about 14 inches. While the Emperors are about three or four feet tall.

Both of these species get their food from the water. They feed on small fish, shrimp and plankton. Plankton is made up of sea life so small that it must be viewed under a microscope before individual specimens of it can be seen. Yet it is so plentiful that it often stains sea ice green. Seals are also plentiful in the waters of Antartica. At one time these mammals were hunted quite extensively for their peets. The leopard seal lives mainly on fish but will eat penguins where possible. Other varieties of seals to be found are the Ross seal and the Weddell seal.

The largest animal in the area is the blue whale. This warm blooded animal sometimes grows to a length of 90 feet and weighs as much as 150 tons. A cousin of the whale is the porpoise. One type of Antartic dolphin has been named the killer whale. These animals are among the most savage of all beasts. They hunt in packs and will attack even the great blue whale. When they see a man or a seal or bird on ice, they dive deep under the ice. And have been known to dump their prey into the water. So far is known, however, no man has been eaten by a killer whale.

The skua gull which has been seen on the icecap within a few miles of the South Pole is the scavenger of Antartic. If garbage is thrown overboard the side of a ship the skua gulls always there to rummage through it. And finally just to get one fact straight: There are no polar bears or land animals in the Antartic!
